

Abstract of the Disclosure

A method and device for performing diagnostic analyses on a liquid system is capable of detecting physical and/or chemical changes within the system by noting temperature changes, typically increases, within the device. These temperature changes can be relayed to alert an operator of the change in physical and/or chemical properties within the system so that remedial action can be taken.